Download AD Sound Recorder right now! no differences in energy cost between exercises performed with (EMS) or without (CON) electrical muscle stimulation. However, both the H-R and the L-R legs showed significantly higher energy cost during leg extensions with EMS compared to CON. This may be related to the possible beneficial effect of electrical muscle stimulation to maintain the correct kinematics of the lower extremities during treadmill walking [1]. Specifically, during walking, positive muscle synergies are activated by electrical muscle stimulation and there is a lower activation of positive muscle synergies in runners during steady-state treadmill walking with electrical muscle stimulation compared to control walking [2]. This study showed higher energy cost during walking and running for both legs for which electrical muscle stimulation was used. This increase was similar to that found in a previous study that compared EMS with normal muscle stimulation [3]. Conclusion =====
